The session focused on guiding students to identify real-world problems relevant to their community, campus, and local ecosystem. Students were trained to evaluate problems using structured frameworks like root-cause analysis. Teams worked collaboratively to convert selected problems into clear, validated problem statements. Faculty mentors helped students understand what makes a problem worth solving using criteria like urgency, user segment size, and value creation.

Students were introduced to the concept of Problem–Solution Fit and learned how to match a solution idea with a genuine user need. Each team proposed initial solution concepts and justified how the solutions address the identified pain-points. The activity encouraged innovative thinking, analytical reasoning, and user-centric approach to problem solving.

By the end of the session, students presented problem–solution pairs, demonstrating practical understanding of innovation fundamentals.

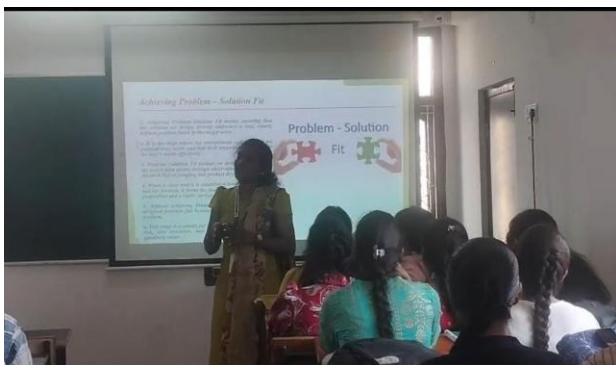

The activity aimed at improving students' capability to identify opportunities and move towards designing deployable prototypes in the next stages of the IIC innovation process.
